The legendary journey of three valiant english forest economists from Flåm to Lom and a celebration of the papers that they missed

Colin Price

They told Newcastle<sup>43</sup>'s travel bureau that this meeting was in Lom<sup>44</sup>.
And left that port where many Europeans travel eastwards from.
And, whether they pronounced it badly,
or the agent had misheard,
he routed them to Flåm, which, sadly, isn't near .... Still, undeterred, they chose to walk, despite unpleasant weather. Though delayed, at least they hoped that they would all be present at the conference's feast.
In snowfall fit for neither man nor beast they set a compass course north-east.

They should have made their start from Otta, if they sought a pleasant stroll<sup>45</sup>.
Yet all Englishmen have got a rod of steel in their soul;
plus this pig-headed disposition:
to turn back is to be disgraced –
the stupider the expedition, the firmer it should be embraced!
They travelled light, with scant provisions on the side of Sognefjorden, knowing in today's decisions past mistakes should be ignored – unless past costs will be restored another day, across the board.

<sup>44</sup> In this part of Ottadalen, they did seem to pronounce it to rhyme with "from".

<sup>45</sup> It's only 60 km to walk from Otta, mostly on nice, snow-free forest tracks.

But what they missed! It would have been a treat our PowerPoints to see!
with papers drawn from each arena
known to skogøkonomi:
computer programs to promote a protocol that would enhance bird habitats in Minnesota, carbon stocks in south-west France;
young researchers who express assurance, that demands exist for aged wood decks (while aged professors drank their beer, and reminisced.
And drank more beer, and got ... a list of other beers they might have missed.)

So, while they walked, our gallant trekkers missed the Danes' strategic games, talks on harvest costs, and Pekka's piece on wood construction frames; Christmas trees and pure ground water;
selling wood to architects;
things that make rotations shorter – tree stems longer; tax effects.
And any paper lacking mention – trees' control on global climate, firewood, forestry extension –
was cut out by need to rhyme it, make it metric, or the time it takes to read prose so sublime.

On, north-east, our valiant heroes painful progress slowly made, confronting two life-threat'ning zeroes: – zero sense, and zero centigrade;
grimly grabbing Norway spruces' branches with each footing missed –
one of cellulose's uses
for which markets don't exist.
(And that is one of many diverse topics that in future you must underscore: you'll need examples from the tropics, temp'rate regions, and the boreal.
Any international tutorial must mean teaching more than immemorial facts that students used to learn before!)

Onwards still across the jøkulls, up the fjells and down the dals, shouting English at the locals
in a landscape like Nepal's;
on, with energy fantastic,
never stopping for a break,
up and down – just like stochastic walks that market prices take.
So, having talked of fluctuating rates at which the market lends, let's now join in celebrating these, and other, absent friends, who made mistakes, and could not make amends, or else were left too poor to come at all, by long-term timber prices' trends.

And there were presentation slots relating how folk, frozen out by winds of change, risk exclusion from participating:
meanwhile, high upon the mountain range, risking being cold cadavers
frozen by the bitter wind, on, our English heroes traverse Galdhøpiggen, Glittertind.
But now I must report with deepest sorrow,
the fate that soon awaits these coolest dudes:
they should arrive at Fossheim<sup>46</sup> late tomorrow, exactly as our conference concludes.
